

COMMA TIP 6

Use commas correctly with a series of adjectives.

Whenever you use more than one adjective to describe something, you must decide whether or not you need commas to separate the adjectives. Coordinate adjectives require commas.

Noncoordinate adjectives, however, need no punctuation. How do you tell the difference? Coordinate adjectives can pass two tests:

Test 1 – When you reverse the order of the adjectives, the sentence makes sense.

Read this example:

The hungry, slimy, green Martian opened the classroom door, grabbed Claudette, and took her to lunch at Bernie’s Burger Emporium.

The three adjectives—hungry, slimy, and green—can alternate their positions without hurting the meaning of the sentence:

The slimy, hungry, green Martian opened the classroom door ...

The hungry, green, slimy Martian opened the classroom door ...

The green, slimy, hungry Martian opened the classroom door ...

Because these adjectives can be interchanged, they are coordinate and must have commas between them.

Test 2 – When you insert and between the adjectives, the sentence makes sense.

Read this example:

While writing his final exam, a pale, sweating, panicky student stared at his sentence, trying to decide if a comma was necessary between two adjectives.

Notice that you can insert and between the three adjectives and the sentence still makes sense [although there is some unnecessary repetition].

While writing his final exam, a pale and sweating and panicky student stared at his sentence ...

Noncoordinate adjectives can pass neither of the tests above. Whenever you discover that you have noncoordinate adjectives in a sentence, use no punctuation between them.

Read this sentence:

Five flashy sports cars passed poor Jared, who rattled down the interstate in his '78 Chevette.

Notice that if you move the location of the adjectives, you create illogic:

Sports flashy five cars passed poor Jared ... Huh?

Flashy sports five cars passed poor Jared ... What?

Five sports flashy cars passed poor Jared ... Makes no sense!

In addition, if you insert and between the adjectives, the sentence loses its meaning:

Five and flashy and sports cars passed poor Jared ... Excuse me?

When you encounter noncoordinate adjectives, those that fail the two tests detailed above, do not use commas between them.

2. The cute soft frisky ferret will bite your fingers if you try to pick him up.
3. Michael's faded ragged New York Jets jacket was an inappropriate choice of clothing for his second interview at Sun Trust Bank.
4. The hot spicy appetizing squid eyeball stew steamed in a bowl on the clean shiny kitchen counter.
